He explained that film is not a language, but is like a language, and since it is like language, some of the methods that we use to study language might probably be applied to a study of film. The fact is that film, unlike written or spoken language, is not composed of units, as such, but is rather a continuum of meaning. A shot contains as much information as we want to read in it, and whatever units we define within the shot are arbitrary. Like written language, but to a greater degree, a film image or sound has both denotative and connotative meanings and we have to strive to recognize it.

The programme ended with the question -answer discussions. The session developed subject specific skills in film theory and film techniques amongst students helping them to analyze films based on contemporary film, literary and cultural theory.
